A Night Attack

BY THE 66TH O. BATTALION

SYNOPSIS—

The advance guard of an Army advancing from the West; Camp for the night by the side of a river; Establishing an outpost line for protection. Before bivouacing, a Trestle Bridge is built across the river, with a view to expediting the advance in the morning. Soon after bivouacing they are surprised by the enemy from the East, and a sharp outpost engagement takes place, in which the enemy are driven off and followed up. The bridge is blown up by one of the shells of the retreating enemy's guns, but not until a force sufficient to rout the enemy has crossed the river.

GOD SAVE THE KING

LT. COL. GEORGE BROWN MCLEOD

Officer Commanding the 63rd O. Battalion, C. E. F., was born in Guelph, Ont. In 1908 he obtained his Captaincy in the 101st Edmonton Fusiliers and served continuously in this Regiment up to and about November, 1914, when he volunteered for active service and was appointed Senior Captain in the 31st O.
